116, 342 Aurupik

In the Central Carolines they used to employ the Yap style of building as may still be seen. On Aurupik the houses were sometimes built on a stone platform raised six feet above the level of the ground, covering a space of 120 square yards; with high towering gable ends they were an imposing sight, (South Sea Topography, 117) it is said. But today they are mostly set directly on the ground.
